"Health is not something we can attain as individuals, for ourselves, hermetically sealed off from the world around us. An injury to one is an injury to all."

Our bodies, societies and our planet are inflamed.

Heart diseases in particular and inflammation in general are not only connected to nutrition, water, and air, as well as access to prevention/health care, but is linked to trauma we experience. Showing the relationships between health and political, economic and environmental systems has the potential to transform not only our bodies but the world through science and art.

"Deep Medicine" and art heal what has been efficiently divided: nature and culture/civilisation, rationality and sensibility and vulnerability. Instead of the domination of nature, society, and life our corporality and vulnerability within our ecological environment and specific situations must be taken into consideration. In times when technology can become autonomous and turn against humans, performers of science, medicine, technology and art as "emblems of progress" take responsibility for a critical, reasonable application of technical innovations. - Margareta Klose -
